Not illustrated. 1922 Excerpt: ...was found near Telegraph Creek, laid on the bare ground in open woods. The female, shot before the egg was found, contained a second egg, nearly ready to be laid. A set of two eggs, slightly incubated, was taken June 26 in the same tract of woods. This was an area that had been burned over, leaving a scattering growth of small lodgepole pines, with but little underbrush between. A third set was collected at Doch-da-on Creek, July 18. These were incubated within a few days of hatching. The eggs were placed on the bare ground in an open place in the woods. On all sides, some thirty or forty yards distant, there was dense brush, but the ground was open in the immediate vicinity of the eggs. 2 For the use of this name for the northwestern nicker, see Palmer, 1916, p. 322. The parent of the second set was extremely solicitous of their safety. She flew as we approached, coming toward us with a peculiarly halting and uncertain flight, with her tail depressed until it pointed almost straight down, and with her mouth open. Alighting near-by, she wallowed on the ground, thus luring us in pursuit for about twenty or thirty yards, then flew off in a circle through the woods. The parent of the set at Doch-da-on Creek acted quite differently. She left the eggs while the intruder was still some distance away, departing quietly and without any manifestations of solicitude. In just twenty minutes she returned, as secretively as she had left. This course of action was followed without variation on three different occasions. Four specimens were collected (nos. 39790-39793), two adult males and two adult females. To my eye they are indistinguishable from specimens of Chordeiles v. virginianus from the eastern United States. Cypseloides niger borealis (Kennedy). Black Swift A f...
