

Religious Maxims (Classic Reprint)

Excerpt from Religious Maxims
The following Maxims do not have relation to religion in its full extent; but to the higher degrees of religious experience. They embody, in a concise and simple form, many of the principles which are laid down and illustrated at some length in the larger treatises on holiness. Tested not more by my own personal experience than by a careful observation of others, they seem to me to be characterized by the truth; but I am not so sanguine as to suppose that they will all be correctly understood and appreciated by all persons. They must be interpreted and applied, in some degree at least, by the existing mental position. Those who are truly seeking after holiness of heart, and have realized, in some considerable degree, the object of their search, will not be likely to fail, either in understanding their import, or in making a proper application of them.
