

Water is life. Water is Peace. Water is health. Water is divine. Water is friend. Water is necessary for all living beings. Use of clean and pure water will add human longevity and make them disease-free. But mismanagement of water sources and mis-use of water could destroy the living beings; create climate imbalance; cause health hazards; cause water wars and destroy peace and longevity of people. Two fifths of the world's population faces water shortages. During the coming decades, water scarcity is expected to rise as a result of a rapid increase in the demand for water due to population growth, urbanization and increasing consumption of water per capita. In addition, climate change is expected to influence the supply of water, modifying the regional distribution of freshwater resources. Agriculture is the largest consumer of freshwater resources and consequently highly vulnerable to changes in water availability. International trade in food products is not only a key variable in global food security; it is also a key variable in water management for agriculture. As water becomes scarcer, it results in low crop yield and fallow land. Life in water scarce regions is unimaginable and life with scanty water resources losses peace. Is virtual water trade a realistic option for managing water scarcity beyond providing information on the water content of products? For which countries can virtual water trade be a meaningful option to cope with water scarcity and to what extent will water-deficit countries rely on domestic food production to ensure food security and avoid market volatilities? What kinds of incentives and administrative structures are needed to realize benefits from virtual water trade? Under what conditions will virtual water trade improve the global use of freshwater resources? How will the peasants in water-scarcity regions be affected by such a change in policy? What policy measures are needed to ensure that poor people benefit from virtual water imports? How can the water-deficit countries finance imports of water-intensive agricultural products? What are the limiting factors for a successful use of the concepts and how can they overcome? 'Water for Peace' was discussed in the fourth Global Economic symposium in Germany on October 4-5, 2011. This topic needs more attention as water is life of all people, animals, plants and the living world
